

RED TIGER EYE

Raghavendra Lal Rai

This is the first exhibition of Raghavendra Rai, yet the clarity and restraint of his visual language suggest a practice already grounded in sustained observation. His engagement with forests began early—through repeated immersion in wild landscapes, through the discipline of working with bees and beehives, and through learning to see with a camera placed in his hands with encouragement and trust. Long hours at dawn and deep into night shaped his method, guided not by display, but by attention.

Raghavendra photographs the wild not as something to be possessed or mastered, but as a living system to be encountered. His images hold the stillness of the forest floor, the precision of the small and the overlooked, and the quiet intensity that emerges through patience. There is a distinct sensitivity in his work that reflects his own quiet disposition—an ability to observe without intrusion.

Artists statement:

My first tiger sighting is what really brought out my love for nature. I was eight at the time and went for a safari in Pench National Park. What was thrilling was the chase. In Indian jungles the dense undergrowth ensures we use our ears as much as our eyes when finding big cats. We heard lots of alarm calls from sambar deer and followed pugmarks left behind by tigers. Then we saw her, the queen of the jungle, Collarwali. She approached me and came within touching distance and instead of panicking, I was really calm.

Upon seeing my love for nature and photography, my massi gifted me my first camera for my 10th birthday. Just months later, I took a photo that told me I could one day develop a skill for photography. This photo is exhibited here today. I continued to take lots of photos year by year and constantly improved my skill.
